For more information about Photoshop, including a free trial, visit www.adobe.com/opt. Google+ does three things. It's a social media site for users, a social media platform for companies, and an image and video sharing site. It's a tool that allows users to create and upload images and videos, and then allow their friends and acquaintances to see and comment on them. Google+ has over 1.6 million users, has been around for a long time, and has received some rather positive press. It is still relatively new, but has been gaining popularity in the past few months. It's free, though it does have some limitations. Like many social media sites, Google+ has a feature that allows you to upload multiple photos or videos at once. This is more than just saving you time; it also allows users to create interesting collages of images and videos. Google+ is easier to use than Facebook for creating collages. You can put your images in a certain order without having to spend too much time designing and arranging them. Google+ collages are a great way to share a lot of content in an easily accessible manner. Google+ has almost 150 million active users and is available on desktop, mobile, and tablet devices. It is also accessible as a standalone tool and is available in a number of different languages. For more information, visit www.google.com/+.

MPs have voted against Prime Minister David Cameron's plans to overhaul the voting system, arguing that the plans could lead to a major increase in "safeguarding" payments to people who vote tactically. Mr Cameron has promised to bring in a new voting system in place of the current "first past the post" system, which is used in around 70% of English constituencies. The plans include an end to the "purdah" of an MP and a reduction of the number of MPs per region from 650 to 600. However, the plans, which were first revealed in 2010, have sparked a fierce row and have been criticised by some MPs as well as party members and civil servants. Critics have questioned whether it would "decapitate" some constituencies and whether the plans would help to reduce the number of MPs from 650, as promised by the Conservatives, while critics have also questioned whether the proposed changes would benefit the Conservatives. Mr Cameron has said the changes will make it harder for smaller parties to win seats and help to ensure that more MPs represent the views of their constituents - but have also raised concerns over whether such changes will reduce the number of safe Conservative seats. However, Mr Cameron has made changes to his proposals since they were first announced, moving from a mandatory referendum on changing to a referendum on a proposed voting system. The proposals were not included in the 2010 Conservative manifesto, although Mr Cameron and Nick Clegg agreed in 2011 that the issue would be back on the agenda. The former Tory leader, William Hague, has confirmed that he will stand in the new system, while a source close to Mr Cameron has also said that the proposals have been examined by Mr Cameron's team. However, after the Commons vote, Mr Cameron's team said no major changes had been made - but there had been a debate about the voting system. "The Prime Minister has said before that he believes that PR is a step forward," said a Downing Street spokesman, "In this case it is one of the reforms we are planning to consider." It was also pointed out that the reform proposals would be similar to those unveiled by the Labour party at its conference in Liverpool. Baroness Amos, the Cabinet Office minister, said in a written statement after the vote that: "The prime minister has been clear that this is a major reform which is why we
